

The Enchanted Castle.

ment of the by-standers, confirms the lie which her wicked husband had told before; not perceiving his ghastly corpse, which is carrying off behind her after he had been stricken dead for his falsehood, nor yet the angry angel who is hovering over her head, and already moving his sword to repeat the same vengeance upon her. This is, indeed, a very capital piece; and I hope, that when Master False-tongue and Miss Fib-teller have read my account of it (and I must beg of Mr. Newbery to send it to them;) I hope, I say, that they will be wise enough to take warning, and, for the time to come, not to tell a lie upon any account; for it will be a terrible thing to be struck dead in that instant, in which a falsehood is dropping from their lips.

The fifth picture which presents itself is the murder of Abel, which hath been very strikingly represented by Mr. Tenderheart: for that I believe is the name of the painter. As to my part, the scene is so wonderfully moving, that I could never bear

1

The Enchanted Castle

bear to look upon it with Poor Abel! there he lies, with all covered with blood, and his wounds and dirt, still stretching hands for mercy, and crying, "Oh, forgive me," while Cain, hearted brother, stands scowling and lifts up his club to give him the last fatal blow. Inhuman brother! ruffian hand! and if it does not shock thee to see thy own flesh the son of thy mother, lie bleed

D